I am writing this letter in support of Dr. Jovana Stojkovic who is under investigation or under some sort of pressure from medical authorities for advocating precautionary procedures before vaccinating people indiscriminately.

Over these past few years, I have seen and evaluated people, primarily children, regarding the wisdom or lack thereof of administering vaccinations. Many of these families have already suffered severe damage as a result of vaccination. In fact, I have on file 15 cases of children who died very soon after vaccination. Many more than that have children who quickly regressed into autism after vaccination. The major offender in that regard is the MMR vaccine. It is obvious that some percentage of human beings do not have the genetic makeup to withstand certain vaccines.

This amassed clinical experience of several thousand children has left me with the point of view that it is as unwise to rush into vaccination as it would be unwise to rush immediately into surgery for abdominal pain. Caution should be applied, a careful family history should be taken, and genetic testing should be used to avoid giving vaccines to people who would be at risk for vaccine damage.

Perhaps these comments will be of use to Dr. Stojkovic and to the medical authorities who may be looking into her practice of medicine.

Yours truly,

Ron Kennedy, M.D.
